[*907]

On April 12, 1900, the Congress of the United States enacted the Foraker Act of 1900, n1 which replaced the governing military regime in Puerto Rico with a civil form of governance. n2 Section VII of this act created a Puerto Rican citizenship for the residents of the island. n3 This citizenship was reaffirmed by the United States Supreme Court in 1904 by its ruling in Gonzales v. Williams. n4 The Puerto Rican citizenship was again reaffirmed on November 18, 1997, by the Puerto Rican Supreme Court through its ruling in Miriam J. Ramirez de Ferrer v. Juan Mari Bras. n5 Mari Bras, however, through his renouncing of U.S. Citizenship, sought to redefine Section VII as a source of law that recognized a Puerto Rican nationality separate from that of the United States. n6

Rogers M. Smith contends that U.S. "justices were apparently willing for Puerto Ricans, like other peoples of color, to be designated 'American' so long as what that meant in terms of citizenship status remained unclear." n7 Smith's argument suggests that the Puerto Rican citizenship is a direct result of the racist ideologies of the moment. In this paper I would like to analyze this argument by arguing that the Puerto Rican citizenship is directly linked to a status of space that was in turn created by racist ideologies. In other words, while it is evident that there is a relationship between the Puerto Rican citizenship and the racial ideologies of the progressive era, this relationship is mediated by a spatial configuration.

The Puerto Rican spatial configuration that I am alluding to can be understood as a liminal condition. This notion of a liminal condition is informed by a reading of Michel Foucault's notion of the liminal, which he uses to explain the status of the madman at the dawn of the [*908] Renaissance. n8 Explaining how madmen were generally placed on ships and ferried away from the city, Foucault argues that

The madman's voyage is at once a rigorous division and an absolute Passage. In one sense, it simply develops, across a half-real, half-imaginary geography, the madman's liminal position on the horizon of medieval concern - a position symbolized and made real at the same time by the madman's privilege of being confined within the city gates: his exclusion must enclose him; if he cannot and must not have another prison than the threshold itself, he is kept at the point of passage. He is put in the interior of the exterior, and inversely. A highly symbolic position, which will doubtless remain his until our own day, if we are willing to admit that what was formerly a visible fortress of order has now become the castle of our conscience. n9

In the context of Puerto Rico, this argument would suggest that the Puerto Rican space is located on the horizon or the juridical line separating the foreign from the domestic. The political expression of this juridical status could suggest that Puerto Rico is somewhere in between colonial and territorial status. My contention in this paper is that this ambiguous condition facilitated the creation of a Puerto Rican citizenship that could be distinguished from an Anglo-American citizenship and an alien status. Moreover, this ambiguous condition served as a prison for the Puerto Rican citizen, preventing him from becoming either an Anglo-American citizen or a citizen of a sovereign nation-state. It also resulted in a status that was not entitled to the constitutional protections and civil liberties guaranteed to the U.S. citizen and the alien.

I. Antecedents

Smith contends that citizenship during the Progressive Era could be understood within a four-tiered hierarchical structure, which included the following:

First, the excluded status of people denied entry to and subject to the expulsion from the U.S., generally owing to their ethnic or ideological traits; second, colonial subjectship, reserved chiefly for territorial inhabitants declared racially ineligible for citizenship; third, second class citizenship, usually understood as required by impartial grants of formal citizenship to races not capable of exercising it, and as the proper status for women; and fourth full citizenship, including voting rights. n10

In principle, the Puerto Rican citizenship could be located somewhere between the second and third tiers. This argument, however, does not [*909] account for the juridical creation of the Puerto Rican citizenship. In addition, it is unclear whether Smith's conception of citizenship can exist independent of a national imagining. Smith's notion of the relationship of the citizen to the nation does not account for a liminal spatial status, with liminal citizens, within the nation. n11

In my opinion, there are at least two constitutional precedents that could be used to explain the Puerto Rican citizenship paradigm. The first can be traced to the early founding of the U.S. and located in the debates regarding the Federalist enactment of the Alien and Sedition Acts of 1798. n12 Under the climate of these laws, it is possible to locate two juridical conceptions of citizenship, namely a State and a Federal citizenship. Certainly the Supreme Court's early rulings on its jurisdiction over cases arising between "citizens of different states" under article III n13 suggests some possible parallels to the question at hand. n14 The problem, however, is that in these early cases states continued to claim a level of sovereignty that threatened the possibility of a federal government. In the case of Puerto Rico, the territory posed no threat to the Union, and because of its territorial condition, it could not make a claim to share in power with other states. Moreover, it would seem that the 14th Amendment created a national conception of citizenship that would have precluded a Puerto Rican citizenship. n15

A second possible precedent could be located in the experience of indigenous peoples in the United States. Certainly the notion of the Domestic Dependent Nation n16 and/or the juridical concept of the "alien nation" n17 are quite similar to the subsequent unincorporated status of Puerto Rico. Moreover, indigenous people were construed as an alien race living under the tutelage of the federal government. n18 The problem with establishing a direct parallel with the indigenous experience is that Puerto Rico was treated as a territory, albeit unincorporated, whereas Indian territories were considered domestic dependent nations. In other words, while Puerto Rico could eventually become a state of the Union, domestic dependent nations were precluded from becoming anything more than [*910] an occupied territory. In addition, it is evident that lawmakers recognized the existing Spanish civil law tradition in Puerto Rico as a "civilized" form of law. n19

A. Treaty of Paris of 1898

The Spanish-Cuban-American War of 1898 marked a paradigmatic shift in U.S. territorial policy. To be sure, Scott B. Cook summarizes the forces shaping this historical moment as follows:

By the 1890s continental expansion had reached its limit, dramatized by the occupation of the immense area bordered by Canada, Mexico, and the Pacific Ocean and cemented by the final elimination of American resistance at Wounded Knee (1890). In 1893 the historian Frederick Jackson Turner pronounced the American frontier closed. It had, he claimed, defined the American experience but it would no longer do so. With British Canada and independent Mexico unobtainable without a costly war and international censure, some Americans turned an anxious and hopeful gaze on overseas territories as the next beneficiaries of America's great democratic and capitalist experiment. n20

With the conquest of Puerto Rico, the Philippines, and Cuba, the U.S. moved from an "expansionist" territorial policy to an "imperialist" foreign policy. n21 Puerto Rico was formally conquered and ceded to the United States on July 25, 1898, under the tenets of the Treaty of Paris of 1898. n22 Although the validity of this treaty is questionable, the Treaty of Paris has been recognized as the first juridical text to establish the hegemonic relationship of the United States over Puerto Rico. n23

For the purpose of this paper, I will focus my discussion on Article IX of this treaty, which addressed the questions of citizenship, space, and civil rights on the island. Article IX can be divided into three provisions. The first provision outlines the rights of the Spanish subjects in Puerto Rico and reads as follows:

Spanish subjects, natives of the Peninsula, residing in the territory over which Spain by the present treaty relinquishes or cedes her sovereignty, may remain in such territory or may remove therefrom (sic), retaining in either event all their rights of property, including the rights to sell or dispose of such property or of its proceeds; and they shall have the [*911] right to carry on their industry, commerce, and professions being subject in respect thereof to such laws as are applicable to other foreigners. n24

This provision recognizes a distinction between the Spanish peninsular (born on the Spanish peninsula) and the Spanish Creole (born on the island). n25 This distinction is critical. First, from a historical point of view, we should note that the Spanish concept of race was generally associated with the individual's birthplace and his or her Casta. n26 Presumably, Spanish Creoles born in Puerto Rico were inferior to the Spanish Peninsulars with regard to the Spanish social hierarchy. Secondly, by recognizing a birthright distinction in this treaty, the Spanish clearly established that Puerto Ricans were not equals, thus undermining the 1897 Charter of Autonomy. n27

The second provision directly addresses the allegiance and nationality of the residents of Puerto Rico. n28 Under this provision, Spanish subjects not born in the peninsula could retain allegiance to Spain by declaring their loyalty in a local court. Otherwise, they would become nationals of Puerto Rico. n29 The creation of a Puerto Rican nationality enabled the U.S. to eventually justify not naturalizing the island residents because they possessed a separate national identity. This policy led to the creation of an ambiguous status somewhere between an alien and a national owing allegiance to the United States. Jose Lopez Baralt contends that this is a departure from a previous policy of extending citizenship rights to the residents of newly acquired territories. n30 He suggests that this departure can be attributed to the lack of desire of the U.S. to naturalize Filipinos, as well as "the numerous uncivilized tribes" and Chinese inhabiting the archipelago. n31

The concluding portion of Article IX stated that "the civil rights and political status of the native inhabitants of the territories hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress." n32 Congress, however, neglected to pass any legislation until 1900. n33 Thus, between 1898 and 1900, Puerto Rico was governed by a succession of military [*912] governors under the direct authority of the President of the United States. Lopez Baralt suggests that in the absence of any Congressional legislation the President could retain the power to decide how to govern the island as Commander-in-Chief, assuming of course that he was engaged in restoring peace and order. n34

More importantly, this provision transferred authority to the Congress, including the power to establish local courts of law on the island. Eventually, the Puerto Rican legal system was redeveloped by Congress with the advice of these military governors. n35 The goal was to create a legal system that was consistent with an Anglo-Saxon legal tradition.

In sum, the Treaty of Paris of 1898 became the foundation of the jurisprudence that would define the contours of the subsequent juridical relationship between the United States and Puerto Rico, and a key document in the creation of a Puerto Rican citizenship. First, the cession of the island created an ambiguous tutelary status subject to U.S. Congressional governance. Second, the cession established a Puerto Rican national subject that was distinct from the Spanish or the AngloAmerican citizen. This latter power enabled lawmakers to create an ambiguous juridical/political status for Puerto Rico, clearly outside of the confines of traditional territorial policies.

B. The Military Regime and General Davis

After the signing of the Treaty of Paris, President McKinley placed a succession of military governors on the island whose main goal was "to keep order, protect life and property, and get things ready for the establishment of a civil government in substitution of itself." n36 The legal source of their power was outlined in the General Order 101. n37 More importantly, the military governors were further charged with establishing a legal regime and making recommendations to the federal government through special reports. n38 These, in turn, informed lawmakers in their policy-making initiatives. As one might suspect, these reports captured the racial prejudices that the generals used to understand the Puerto Rican demography.

Trias Monge contends that Brigadier General George W. Davis was instrumental in the development of a Puerto Rican legal system that could be integrated to the U.S. Anglo-Saxon legal system. n39 While Davis thought that the existing legal system in Puerto Rico was "un-American and strange," he was confident that this "strangeness" would disappear [*913] one by one and "ultimately a much more complete harmony of the Puerto Rican with the American system of procedure will come into being." n40 This recognition of the civil code, albeit strange, eventually enabled lawmakers to make a general distinction between Puerto Rico and other territories, ascribing to the island an unprecedented level of judicial sovereignty.

In addition to grappling with the island's legal system, Davis finds himself trying to figure out how to "racialize" the Puerto Rican. Ultimately, Davis constructs a sort of Puerto Rican racial alterity. n41 The famous "Indian hunter" described the population of the island in the following manner:

The last census, that of 1897, showed that the pure-blood negroes have numbered but 73,824 out of 899,394, while of the same total there were 242,000 mulattoes. Combining the full and mixed bloods, and designating them as colored (the term by which they are known in the States), it would appear that the pure white are in a considerable majority; and comparing both totals with the statistics of the year 1847 it would seem that in that decennial period the numbers of these denominated above as colored are not increasing in numbers, but instead have actually decreased. n42

As this statement suggests, the Puerto Rican did not fit Davis' imagining of an internal Other (black American), an external Other (Spaniard), nor the Self (White Anglo-Saxon). This was further evidenced in his melancholic complaint that "between the negro and the peon there is no visible difference. It is hard to believe that the pale, sallow, and often emaciated beings are the descendants of the conquistadores who carried the flag of Spain to nearly all of South America, and to one-third of North America." n43

Thus at this early moment of conquest we can further discern the racialization of a Puerto Rican race in an ambiguous way, and to a certain extent, in a status of alterity. In attempting to racialize the Puerto Rican, Davis finds a white Puerto Rican that does not have the status of the Anglo-Saxon, and a black/peon Puerto Rican that is not like the American Negro. What is clear, however, is that while the White/Caucasian Puerto Rican acquires an alterity status more akin to the Anglo-Saxon, but never an equal, the black and the "peon" are represented in marginalized ways akin to the American Negro. Together with the description of the existing legal system, these descriptions enable [*914] Congressional lawmakers to legitimize the creation of a distinct Puerto Rican juridical space and its distinct Puerto Rican citizen.

C. The Foraker Act of 1900

The Foraker Act effectively ended the military regime's governance and created a civil government for the island in 1900 under the direct hegemony of the United States. Lopez Baralt notes that the Foraker Act lays out three distinct political provisions, namely "the creation of a Puerto Rican citizenship, the proffer of American protection for the island's citizenry, and the constitution of a body politic by these citizens." n44 He further notes that

This creation of a special body politic, and the creation by express declaration of citizenship of the territory, were departures from the former territorial practice of Congress. One is tempted to ask what was the objective of Congress in making these provisions. We do not know of any need that they fulfilled. On the contrary, it would seem that they are misleading. Generally speaking, in public law, citizenship and sovereignty are reciprocal and inseparable. The inhabitants of the Islands were made citizens, - but of what? Of a body politic therein created which undoubtedly was not sovereign in any international sense. n45

Citing Senator Foraker, Bothwell contends that the objective of the Foraker Act was to annex Puerto Rico and place it in a tutorial condition geared towards eventual statehood. n46 This, however, resulted in the creation of an ambiguous liminal status that was tempered by both a colonial condition and a territorial tradition. In fact, Puerto Rico acquired both colonial attributes as well as territorial entitlements. Puerto Rico acquired a foreign character for domestic purposes, yet it was located at the margins of a U.S. imperial border.

The Puerto Rican citizenship gave material expression to this ambiguous status. Section VII of the General Provisions created a Puerto Rican citizenship that required national loyalty while simultaneously denying its bearer the basic protections of the U.S. Bill of Rights. n47 The language of the text is clear:

That all inhabitants continuing to reside therein who were Spanish subjects on the eleventh day of April, eighteen hundred and ninety-nine, and then resided in Porto Rico, and their children born subsequent thereto, shall be deemed and held to be citizens of Porto Rico, and as such entitled to the protection of the United States, except such as shall have been elected to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain. n48 [*915]

Thus, the Puerto Rican citizen acquired the responsibilities of U.S. citizenship with no protections or entitlements. Senator Foraker would later argue that Puerto Ricans were "in a worse situation than aliens, for aliens may become naturalized citizens of the United States and Puerto Ricans can not." n49 To be sure, Bothwell notes that under the immigration laws of the period, one had to renounce his or her foreign citizenship in order to acquire a U.S. citizenship. Puerto Ricans, however, were unable to renounce their citizenship because it was not a foreign citizenship. Thus, Puerto Ricans were unable to become U.S. citizens, and the Puerto Rican citizenship in turn lacked any type of international recognition on account of its domestic nature. n50 Puerto Ricans became juridical prisoners at the gates of the empire.

II. Insular Cases

As I suggested earlier, my argument is further institutionalized by the Supreme Court in a series of rulings beginning in 1901 known as the Insular Cases. n51 Constitutional historian David P. Currie has described the rulings rendered in 1901 as the "most interesting and controversial decisions about the Bill of Rights during the Fuller era . . ." n52 John W. Burgess in turn once described these as "the most momentous, next to that of domestic slavery." n53 These decisions have defined both the status of Puerto Rico and its subsequent relationship to the United States. For the purposes of this paper, I will only focus on a discussion of three issues that can help contextualize my overall argument, namely the [*916] doctrine of un-incorporation, the distinction between belonging and being a part of the United States, and the reaffirmation of a Puerto Rican citizenship. In my opinion, the contours of the resulting U.S.--Puerto Rico relationship were contingent upon a conceptualization of an inferior Puerto Rican race.

Seven of the nine Insular Cases decided in 1901 addressed legal questions regarding the status of Puerto Rico. In De Lima, the Court's first ruling, the justices addressed the question of whether D.A. De Lima and Co. could recover duties exacted by the Customs Office in New York from certain importations of sugar emanating out of Puerto Rico during 1899. n54 In this case, the petitioner argued that the exactions made under the Tariff Act of 1897 did not apply to Puerto Rico because the island had ceased to be a foreign country, as defined by the Act, after the signing of the Treaty of Paris of 1898. n55 Petitioners further argued that Puerto Rico had become a territory of the United States and therefore any imposition of taxes and excises on the island, not applicable to other parts of the Union, would constitute a violation of the Uniformity Clause of the Constitution. n56 The U.S. Attorney General countered that the Uniformity Clause applied to States and not to territories. n57 Moreover, as Efren Rivera Ramos succinctly notes, the Solicitor General further contended that

(a) the act of cession did not make the territory, ipso facto, a part of the United States, but merely a possession; (b) newly acquired territory becomes a part of the United States only if Congress so determines; (c) the power of Congress over those territories that have not become a part of the United States is "plenary," "absolute," "full and complete," subject only to fundamental limitations imposed by the Constitution, as defined by the Courts. n58

The majority rejected the theory that presupposed that a territory may be held indefinitely by the United States; that it may be treated in every particular, except for tariff purposes, as domestic territory; that insurrections may be suppressed, wars carried on, revenues collected, taxes imposed; in short, that everything may be done which a government can do within its own boundaries, and yet the territory may still remain a foreign country. n59

However, the Court did acknowledge that "nonaction sic of Congress may occasion a temporary inconvenience; but it does not follow that [*917] courts of justice are authorized to remedy it by inverting the ordinary meaning of words." n60

The Court concluded, "Porto Rico was not a foreign country within the meaning of the tariff laws, but a territory of the United States, that duties were illegally exacted, and that the plaintiffs are entitled to recover them back." n61 The dissent, however, sought to locate the Puerto Rican in the same juridical status as the "uncivilized" Indian. n62 By rethinking the Puerto Rican case within the context of an uncivilized and savage paradigm, the justices could situate Puerto Rico somewhere in between a foreign and domestic status.

By the time that the Court rendered its opinion in the fifth Insular Case, Puerto Rico had acquired a new status and a new doctrine was born. In Downes, the Court ruled on the validity of a tariff tax imposed on imports from Puerto Rico after the passage of the Foraker Act in 1900. n63 Justice Brown concluded that If those possessions are inhabited by alien races, differing from us in religion, customs, laws, methods of taxation, and modes of thought, the administration of government and justice, according to Anglo-Saxon principles, may for a time be impossible; and the question at once arises whether large concessions ought not to be made for a time, that ultimately our own theories may be carried out, and the blessings of a free government under the Constitution extended to them. We decline to hold that there is anything in the Constitution to forbid such action. We are therefore of the opinion that the island of Porto Rico is a territory appurtenant and belonging to the United States, but not a part of the United States . . . . n64

As this citation suggests, Puerto Rico and the "alien race" that inhabited the island had now become a possession belonging to, but not a part of, the Anglo-Saxon empire.

In a concurring opinion, Justice White introduced a new doctrine of "un-incorporation" that created a new status akin to the domestic dependent nation. The Court concluded that neither the Treaty of Paris nor the Foraker Act had incorporated Puerto Rico into the Union; therefore, the island could be treated in a different manner than that in which States, territories, and possessions were treated. This status, in turn, provided the justices with an excuse for treating the "alien race" residing in the island differently than other U.S. citizens, especially since the island's inhabitants were not entitled to the protection of the Bill of Rights. n65 Surely, the Court reasoned, the responsibilities of the Bill of Rights could not be entrusted upon an uncivilized people. To be sure, incorporation, argued White, would require that Puerto Ricans become U.S. citizens, and Congress had not drafted a bill supporting the collective naturalization of the islanders. n66 Thus, if Congress wished to incorporate Puerto Rico and its inhabitants into the United States, then it could draft a bill and ratify it, or so the logic went.

The Court's subsequent reaffirmation of the Foraker citizenship is further illustrative of the law's creation of an anomalous category informed by a racial paradigm. Take for example the ruling in Gonzalez, which addressed the detention of Isabela Gonzalez on August 24, 1902 upon her arrival to New York. n67 She was detained by the Immigration Commissioner and was prevented from entering the country because she was an "alien immigrant." n68 The Commissioner sought to bar her entry into the U.S. under the provisions of the Alien Immigration Act of 1891. n69 In a unanimous decision, the Court concluded that since Gonzalez was a native resident of Puerto Rico during the passage of the Treaty of Paris she was not considered an alien immigrant within the meaning of the act in question. n70 Moreover, the Gonzalez ruling suggests, that the Court could continue to regulate the movement of bodies, namely Chinese, and "certain classes of aliens or alien immigrants," into and out of the nation. n71 To be sure, the Court argued that

We think it clear that the act relates to foreigners as respects this country, to persons owing allegiance to a foreign government, and citizens or subjects thereof; and that citizens of Porto Rico, whose permanent allegiance is due to the United States; who live in the peace of the dominion of the United States; the organic laws of whose domicil was enacted by the United States, and is enforced through officials sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, are not 'aliens,' and upon their arrival by water at the ports of our mainland are not 'alien immigrants,' within the intent and meaning of the act of 1891. n72

The decision established a new juridical status located between a U.S. citizenship and a foreign national. Puerto Ricans, although not aliens in the sense of the "Chinese laborers" were not AngloSaxons either, and thus not able to become citizens. The result was a separate and unequal status that would be in place until World War I and in particular, until the [*919] passage of the Jones Act of 1917 which provided for the collective naturalization of the Puerto Rican people.

Concluding Remarks

By way of conclusion, I suggest that the Puerto Rican citizenship is not necessarily a direct result of racist law making. At present, it is unclear to me whether racist policy makers could have justified the creation of a separate and distinct Puerto Rican citizenship, using race as a determinative criteria. This is not to say that race is not a factor in the invention and subsequent institutionalization of a Puerto Rican citizenship. Rather my contention is that lawmakers had to construct a distinct juridical space in which to locate the Puerto Rican citizenship. In this sense, Anglo-Saxon racist ideologies informed the invention of a liminal juridical space, which in turn could legitimize a corresponding Puerto Rican citizenship. In other words, the status of the Puerto Rican space became a precondition of the construction of a Puerto Rican citizenship.

Bidwell, 182 US 244 \(1901\)](#); Huus v. New York and Porto Rico Steamship Company, 182 U.S. 392 \(1901\); Dooley v. U.S., 183 U.S. 151 \(1901\); and The Diamond Rings, 183 U.S. 176 \(1901\). Rivera Ramos further locates the second set of cases between 1903 to 1914, and he includes the following decisions: Haw. v. Mankichi, 190 U.S. 197 \(1903\); Gonzalez v. Williams, 192 U.S. 1 \(1904\); Kepner v. U.S., 195 U.S. 100 \(1904\); Dorr v. U.S., 195 U.S. 138 \(1904\); Mendoza v. U.S., 195 U.S. 158 \(1904\); Rasmussen v. U.S., 197 U.S. 516 \(1905\); Trono v. U.S., 199 U.S. 521 \(1905\); Grafton v. U.S., 206 U.S. 333 \(1907\); Kent v. Porto Rico, 207 U.S. 113 \(1907\); Kopel v. Bingham, 211 U.S. 468 \(1909\); Dowdell v. U.S., 221 U.S. 325 \(1911\); Ochoa v. Hernandez, 230 U.S. 139 \(1913\); and Ocampo v. U.S., 234 U.S. 91 \(1914\). Rivera Ramos further suggests that Balzac v. Porto Rico, 258 U.S. 298 \(1922\) consolidates the development of the Insular Cases. I would suggest, however, that there are subsequent decisions, such as U.S. v. Verdugo-Urquidez, 494 U.S. 259 \(1990\), that could be read as a fourth stage of development of the Insular Cases doctrine.
